Since state funding for the Russell House University Union and Blatt P.E. Center was cut, these institutions must now draw from the activity fee funds shared by student organizations.

Budget reductions put funding in jeopardy

Pastides, campus leaders weigh options for student organization finances

ASSISTANT NEWS EDITOR

USC faces a budget cut of more than $32 million, USC President Harris Pastides said, which may eventually trickle down to decrease student organization budgets. Pastides said the cut is due to reductions in state appropriations for colleges and universities, which stem from the recent national economic downturn. “We thought we had $32 million, but it got taken away,” Pastides said. But don’t think that is the last of it. More cuts could be made in January, though Pastides did not think they would be as severe. “We are planning for that as well,” Pastides said. Despite the cuts, Pastides promises that mid-year tuition raises will not be made to account for the missing funds from the budget. Pastides made this statement not only in a mass e-mail that was sent out to students on Friday, but also during Wednesday’s Faculty Senate meeting. “We’re not imposing a mid-year tuition increase,” Pastides said during the meeting. “That would be wrong.” Student Body Treasurer Jonathan Antonio said he, along with Student Body President Andrew Gaeckle and Student Body Vice President Meredith Ross, had met with Pastides about the cuts. “It’s an incredibly awful thing,” Antonio said. “We get a very small amount of money from the state to begin with.” Antonio said the cuts, though difficult, will create an opportunity for the university to focus on and figure out which expenses are actually worthwhile. Where the cuts will hit most is not yet clear, but Pastides said the deans of every educational program will have their say in how to deal with the decreases in their departments’ budgets. Beginning in the next several days, deans will be meeting to discuss steps they need to take to fit the new budget reality. “Every dean is going to come to us to help make those decisions,” Pastides said. Pastides said he and his assistants are trying to figure out the best route possible to confront the shrinking budget. “We are taking a strategic viewpoint about where the cuts should be made,” Pastides said. Antonio said he agreed with Pastides’s goals for dealing with the budget cuts. “His goal is to keep the academics and the student experience alive and strong,” Antonio said. Pastides said students should not be worried, but that they should know there will be changes on campus next

Bill, amendments proposed at Student Senate meeting

Student Senate proposed a bill with three amendments at last night’s meeting. However, the Senate agreed to move voting on legislation over to next week’s meeting due to the added amendments. Senate Bill #37 — To change the way student organizations receive funding Amendment #1: Student Body Treasurer shall have the power to approve changes in the initial date and/or location of an event. The Student Body Treasurer may also authorize the transfer of up to $100 between funded class codes within individual components of an organization’s budget. Amendment #2: “On campus retreats shall be classified as programs,” and “Off campus retreats shall be classified as conferences.” Amendment #3: “The Finance Committee shall reserve at least 25 percent of the total monies to be allocated to student organizations for each of the finance sessions.” — Compiled by Halley Nani

Election system survives doubts, prior planning eases voting process

Votes cast nationwide with few glitches, absentee ballots help with big turnout

Deborah Hastings
The Associated Press

After all that fuss, the system worked. There was no meltdown, no flurry of lawsuits, no statewide demands for a presidential recount. So does that mean America’s voting machinery is finally fixed? And why did it work so well under record-setting turnout? “Panic,” said Doug Lewis, who heads Election Center, a nonprofit that works with voting officials across the country. “Everyone involved in conducting elections was just on pins and needles the entire year. Over-planning really helped.” There were extra precautions in nearly every precinct. In some areas, helicopters stood by to deliver touch-screen machines if extras were needed. Ballot orders were also increased. The Election Assistance Commission, the federal agency that oversees voting systems and distributes money to improve them, recommended that local jurisdictions recruit twice as many poll workers as in previous elections. “Election officials went to extraordinary lengths to have not only a Plan A, but a Plan B and a Plan C,” Lewis said. In the end, there were a few hiccups — some machines were slow to start up, and voter rolls were missing some names. But for the most part, the system functioned well. It worked even under the onslaught of more than 133 million voters, the largest number in at least 40 years. Many of them waited for hours to choose between John McCain and Barack Obama, the first African-American elected president. “The voters were enthusiastic and just glad to be in the process,” Lewis said. “That attitude really helps. The day goes by much better.” All of which is good news, but no reason to get complacent, voting activists said. “America had its game face on,” said Doug Chapin, director of electionline.org at the Pew Center for the States. “Election officials and poll workers and voters were laser-focused on what they needed to do. They were willing to stand in line. They knew about early voting. They were vigilant about hiring extra poll workers.” Yet, Chapin said, “we need to do more. We didn’t have a close election, and that took some of the pressure off.” Also alleviating pressure on Tuesday was newly popular early voting, which allowed people to mail in ballots or vote in person days before the election. At least one-third of the nation’s general-election ballots were cast that way, according to early estimates. But the process had its downside. Because so many voters wanted to cast early ballots, many people stood or sat or played cards in lines that lasted hours. In Florida, the governor ordered early polling places to stay open 12 hours a day instead of eight. But Ion Sancho, elections director for Florida’s Leon County, said early voting is the answer to overhauling the nation’s varied, and sometimes confounding, voting

USC STUDENT ORGANIZATION

Leader

Amy Fraley, South Carolina
Athletic Training Student Association President

Q: What's does your organization do?

A: We provide students here with a professional organization that they can be a member of. We also do charities and fundraising events so that students can attend conferences without paying so much. It also provides a social way to get to know one another since we have to work together.

Q: Where are you from originally?

A: Spartanburg, S.C.

Q: If you had to pick, would you bungee jump or sky dive?

A: Bungee jump because the thought of skydiving mortifies me.

Q: What's your favorite animal and why?

A: Probably a dog. My roommate got an Australian shepherd puppy and it makes me happy every day.

Local

U.S. Sen. Lindsey Graham was so confident of winning re-election, he was thousands of miles away from his constituents when they sent him to Washington for a second term.

Graham spent his campaign's last hours with GOP presidential nominee John McCain's campaign. Back home, voters were giving the son of restaurant owners about 58 percent of the vote to Democrat challenger Bob Conley's 42 percent, with 94 percent of precincts reporting.

Conley was waiting until every vote was counted.

Graham thanked voters, and said he'll continue to reach across party lines — something that became more of a necessity for Republicans after Tuesday's elections with Democrats picking up even more Senate seats.

"I'll just keep on being me," Graham said after exit polls showed an easy win.

"If they try to increase the size of government and taxes in a way that will hurt the economy, I will be a very formidable opponent," Graham said. "I'll reach out to my Democratic colleagues to see if we can find solutions to problems like Social Security, Medicare — the entitlements — that both parties have to work together to reach a solution. There will be some issues that no one party can solve by itself."

He reached out to Democrats in the campaign's final days, spending some of his remaining $3.5 million on mailings and radio ads targeting Democrats and criticizing Conley, who raised just $23,628 for his long-shot bid.

Conley, a 43-year-old North Myrtle Beach engineer and flight instructor, got his start in politics with an unsuccessful bid as a Republican for an Indiana state legislative seat. He then bolted for the Reform Party. Earlier this year, he was with the GOP as a Horry County executive committee member supporting Ron Paul for president.

LOS ANGELES — Voters put a stop to same-sex marriage in California, dealing a crushing defeat to gay-rights activists in a state they hoped would be a vanguard and putting in doubt as many as 18,000 same-sex marriages conducted since a court ruling made them legal this year.

The gay-rights movement had a rough election elsewhere as well Tuesday. Amendments to ban gay marriage were approved in Arizona and Florida, and Arkansas voters approved a measure banning unmarried couples from serving as adoptive or foster parents. Supporters made clear that gays and lesbians were their main target.

But California, the nation's most populous state, had been the big prize. Spending for and against Proposition 8 reached $74 million, the most expensive social-issues campaign in U.S. history and the most expensive campaign this year outside the race for the White House.

"People believe in the institution of marriage," Frank Schubert, co-manager of the Yes on 8 campaign, said after declaring victory early Wednesday. "It's one institution that crosses ethnic divides, that crosses partisan divides. ... People have stood up because they care about marriage and they care a great deal."

With almost all precincts reporting, election returns showed the measure winning with 52 percent of the vote. An estimated 2 million to 3 million provisional and absentee ballots remained to be tallied, but based on trends the margin of support in favor was secure.

Leaders of the No on 8 campaign said they were not ready to concede.

"Because Prop 8 involves the sensitive matter of individual rights, we believe it is important to wait until we receive further information about the outcome," Geoff Kors, Equality California director, said in a statement Wednesday.

Afghanistan — The Afghan president demanded Wednesday that President-elect Barack Obama put an end to civilian casualties as villagers said U.S. warplanes bombed a wedding party, killing 37 people — nearly all of them women and children.

The U.S. military said it was investigating, and a villager said American forces had given them permission to bury the dead, which he said included 23 children and 10 women. A U.S. spokesman added that "if innocent people were killed in this operation, we apologize and express our condolences."

The bombing Monday afternoon of the remote village of Wech Baghtu in the province of Kandahar destroyed an Afghan housing complex where women and children had gathered to celebrate, villagers said. Body parts littered the wreckage and nearby farm animals lay dead.

Villager Abdul Jalil, a 37-year-old grape farmer whose niece was getting married, told an Associated Press reporter at the scene of the bombing that U.S. troops and Taliban fighters had been fighting about a half mile from his home.

Fighter aircraft destroyed his compound and killed 37 people, including 23 children, 10 women and four men, Jalil said.

No Afghan officials could immediately confirm the number of casualties, which happened in a remote and dangerous part of Kandahar province. But Afghan President Hamid Karzai referred to the deaths at a news conference Wednesday held to congratulate Obama on his presidential election victory.

Karzai said he hopes the election will "bring peace to Afghanistan, life to Afghanistan and prosperity to the Afghan people and the rest of the world." He applauded America for its "courage" in electing Obama.

But he also used the occasion to press Obama to prevent civilians casualties in operations by foreign forces, saying airstrikes had killed people in the Shah Wali Kot district of Kandahar province.

"Our demand is that there will be no civilian casualties in Afghanistan. We cannot win the fight against terrorism with airstrikes," Karzai said. "This is my first demand of the new president of the United States."

President Pastides has said there will not be mid-year tuition raises despite budget cuts.

“You can’t cut that much money without an impact,” Pastides said. “There will be changes.”

Pastides said some classes might be cut, but not ones that would harm the quality of educational programs.

Antonio thinks the impact will be felt more by student organizations, which are currently placed under a divisional moratorium for food and travel expenses. The moratorium does not currently allow organizations to be redeemed for money spent on these things.

It is possible for organizations to bypass the moratorium, but they must prove the money is necessary on a “mission critical” basis.

For example, Antonio said, providing food may help boost membership to an organization, but may not be absolutely vital to the club’s existence.

“Food is not ‘mission critical’ for why you have your organization,” Antonio said.

Though organizations are funded by the student activity fee and therefore will not lose funding as a direct result of the budget cuts, Antonio said some other services use student activity fee funding.

The Russell House and Blatt P.E. Center are funded by the state, and due to the budget cuts they lost $200,000 in funding. Though these programs already used a small portion of the student activity fee to cover expenses, Antonio said they might have to dip deeper into the student activity fee money to cover up their deficit. This, in turn, is why student organizations may have to forfeit funding.

The tradition of other services dipping into the student activity fee funds is a practice which Antonio said dates back to the 1980s.

“The student activity fee was contaminated,” Antonio said.

Antonio said he and his fellow executive officers are trying their best to avoid this from happening.

“We don’t want to set that precedent,” Antonio said.

Ashley Wood, Carolina Productions president, said she agrees with the administration’s proactive approach, but that the cuts will affect her organization.

“I do agree with it,” Wood said. “It’s a smart move.”

Wood, a fourth-year English and political science student, said the organization will be affected most by the hold on travel, which would prohibit her organization from going to the National Association for Campus Activities conference in Tennessee this year.

Carolina Productions travels there every year, and Wood said many of the groups that perform at USC are found at this event.

“I think it will make it harder for our coordinators to find acts to come to campus,” Wood said. “If the hold on travel isn’t lifted, we won’t be able to go.”

Overall, though, Wood said the effects haven’t been too negative and that it will be challenging, but feasible, to deal with the changes.

The money is there to make ends meet, but Antonio said it could be depleted. This is why he said he is searching to make adjustments to the current usage of the student activity fee money.

Adjustments will have to be made, Antonio said, such as possibly not keeping the Russell House open as late for breakfast.

“The Russell House can survive, but it won’t be able to be open as much,” Antonio said.

Though the changes seem drastic, Antonio said student government leaders are ready to fight for students’ best interests.

“We’re fighting for students in this,” Antonio said. “We want to make sure students are OK. We don’t want this to be detrimental to their college experience.”

Individual organization cuts have not yet been decided, but Antonio said this would probably happen around Thanksgiving.

“We don’t want to rush this,” Antonio said.

When Pastides first heard about the future cuts, he, along with his council, assembled on Oct. 17 to figure out how to sufficiently deal with them. Pastides said during the meeting the freeze for hiring new faculty and staff was enacted, but during the Faculty Senate meeting it was announced that the freeze had been lifted.

“I did feel we needed to do that at that moment in time,” Pastides said at the Faculty Senate meeting.

Pastides said he welcomes the ideas and opinions of students and faculty, which can be made through Carolina’s Ideas, the virtual suggestion box available on USC’s Web site.

Pastides expressed interest in making sure students are aware of the situation.

“We want the students to know what’s going on,” Pastides said.

During the meeting’s conclusion, Pastides said he is hopeful about USC’s economic future.

“The budget crisis will not derail us,” Pastides said.

Wall Street stays in turmoil despite Tuesday’s presidential election results

Dow plunges 500 points in face of hope of new president-elect

Sara Lepro & Tim Paradis
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — A case of postelection nerves sent Wall Street plunging Wednesday as investors, looking past Barack Obama’s presidential victory, returned to their fears of a deep and protracted recession. Volatility swept over the market again, with the Dow Jones industrials falling nearly 500 points and all the major indexes tumbling more than 5 percent.

The market was widely expected to give back some gains after a runup that lifted the Standard & Poor’s 500 index more than 18 percent and that gave the Dow its best weekly advance in 34 years; moreover, many analysts had warned that Wall Street faced more turbulence after two months of devastating losses.

But investors lost their recent confidence about the economy and began dumping stocks again.

“The market has really gotten ahead of itself, and falsely priced in that this recession wasn’t going to be as prolonged as thought,” said Ryan Larson, head of equity trading at Voyaguer Asset Management, a subsidiary of RBC Dain Rauscher. “Regardless of who won the White House, these problems are not going away.”

“We’re in a really bad recession, period,” he said. “People are locking in profits and realizing we’re not out of the woods.”

Beyond broad economic concerns, worries about the financial sector intensified after Goldman Sachs Group Inc. began to notify about 3,200 employees globally that they have lost their jobs as part of a broader plan to slash 10 percent of the investment bank’s work force, a person familiar with the situation said. The cuts were first reported last month. Goldman fell 8 percent, while other financial names also fell; Citigroup Inc. dropped 14 percent.

Commodities stocks also fell after steelmaker ArcelorMittal said it would slash production because of weakening demand. Its stock plunged 21.5 percent.

Although the market expected Obama to win the election, as the session wore on investors were clearly worrying about the weakness of the economy and pondered what the Obama administration might do. Analysts said the market is already anxious about who Obama selects as the next Treasury Secretary, as well as who he picks for other Cabinet positions.

“The celebration is over. Today we saw a bit of reality,” said Al Goldman, chief market strategist at Wachovia Securities in St. Louis. “President-elect Obama is coming into a situation with limited experience, having to handle an economy in serious trouble, a couple of wars and terrorism. It’s an extremely tough job.”

Analysts said investors were also uneasy in advance of the Labor Department’s October employment report, to be issued Friday. Economists, on average, expect a 200,000 drop in payrolls, according to Thomson/IFR.

Late-day selling by hedge funds helped deepen the market’s losses during the last hour. More selling by the funds is expected to weigh on the market ahead of a Nov. 15 cutoff for shareholders to notify fund managers of their intent to cash out investments before year-end.

The Dow fell 486.01, or 5.05 percent, to 9,139.27. The blue chips had risen more than 300 on Tuesday, and last week rose 11.3 percent, their biggest weekly gain since 1974.

The S&P 500 index fell 52.98, or 5.27 percent, to 952.77. Through the six sessions that ended Tuesday, the index, the one most closely watched by market professionals, rose 18.3 percent.

The Nasdaq composite index fell 98.48, or 5.53 percent, to 1,681.64, while the Russell 2000 index of smaller companies fell 31.33, or 5.74 percent, to 514.64.

Declining issues outnumbered advancers by about 4 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange, where consolidated volume came to a light 5.29 billion shares compared with 5.45 billion shares traded Tuesday.

“We’re seeing people come into the market at the last minute and the low volume exaggerates moves to the downside and the upside. That really scares the heck out people,” Goldman said.

Wednesday’s trading showed that the market is living up to expectations of continued volatility as it tries to recover from the devastating losses of the last two months.

Bill Stone, chief investment strategist at PNC Wealth Management, said the uncertainty over the direction the government’s financial bailout plan will take under the next administration likely weighed on financial stocks Wednesday.

Analysts agree that Obama’s most immediate priority will be dealing with the nation’s financial crisis and deciding how to further implement the $700 billion rescue package passed by Congress last month.

Goldman said trading could remain turbulent as investors begin assessing the shape and direction of Obama’s forthcoming economic policies.

“The market has to go through a period of figuring out if they are going to gain confidence in Obama and the Congress or lose it,” he said.

Obama’s victory means that industries such as oil and gas producers, utilities and pharmaceuticals may face greater regulation and even taxes, while labor unions and automakers are expected to benefit.

In addition, banks, insurance companies, hedge funds and the rest of the financial sector will almost certainly face attempts at a regulatory overhaul by the Democratic Congress next year.

Among financials, Goldman Sachs fell $7.57, or 8 percent, to $87.43. Citigroup fell $2.05, or 14 percent, to $12.63, while Bank of America Corp. dropped $2.78, or 11.3 percent, to $21.75.

Other sectors that are being closely watched in light of the election results are pharmaceuticals and alternative energy, analysts said.

Merck & Co. fell $2.41, or 7.7 percent, to $28.72. Pfizer Inc., meanwhile, dipped $1.09, or 6 percent, to $17. SunTech Power Holdings Co. was among the alternative energy stocks that declined, falling $6.82, or 21.5 percent, to $24.88.

South Carolinians show support, vote for McCain, Republican party

Historically red state stays true to tradition, gives votes to GOP

Bruce Smith
The Associated Press

South Carolina stayed true to its red state roots, bucking the call for change that swept Democrat Barack Obama into the White House.

For the eighth election in a row, the state voted for a Republican for president as predominantly conservative voters picked John McCain for his experience and the possibility that he could improve the nation's economy.

With 94 percent of South Carolina precincts reporting, McCain had 54 percent of the vote to Obama's 45 percent. More than 1.7 million voters cast ballots, surpassing South Carolina's 2004 voting record.

McCain drew much of his support from voters who said they were worried about the economy, and his win here was a vindication of sorts. His 2000 primary bid stalled in South Carolina, and he ultimately lost to George W. Bush. But his victory in this year's hard-fought primary in January put wind behind the campaign.

"He's right on everything — the war in Iraq, the economy, taxes, you name it. Republicans have better ideas," said Charles Martin, a 57-year-old retiree who voted for McCain in suburban Columbia.

Besides the presidential election, voters also sent Republican U.S. Sen. Lindsey Graham back to Washington for a second term. All six incumbent congressmen were re-elected. Republicans maintained majorities in the state Legislature, and two proposed amendments to the state constitution allowing governments to invest in stocks to pay benefits to future retirees were rejected.

South Carolina's votes broke starkly along racial lines. Nearly every black voter cast a vote for Obama, and about three-quarters of all white voters opted for McCain, according to an analysis of voter interviews conducted for The Associated Press by Edison Media Research and Mitofsky International.

"We're long overdue for change. Our government has been moving in a certain direction for a very long time. And what's key for me with Obama, even though I am black, is not that he's black, but that he wants change," said George Palmer, a 41-year-old computer analyst from Charleston.

Mary Ann Chastain / The Associated Press

In Greenville, 105-year-old Annie Mae Rosemond cast her vote for Obama.

Assisted by her two-great-grandsons and her granddaughter, Rosemond, who is black, arrived in a wheelchair at the YWCA at around 10 a.m. and passed others waiting in line after she removed an Obama button.

"I felt he would make a good president," said Rosemond, who received a round of applause from a long line of voters as she left.

While many poll managers said the turnout was massive, state elections officials said there were few serious problems at the polls — mostly people unable to find their proper polling places. Around the state, people waited for hours, many waiting in lines before dawn.

White S.C. voters surprisingly go blue

Obama receives unexpected support in conservative state

Seanna Adcox
The Associated Press

White voters accounted for the bulk of people casting ballots in South Carolina's presidential contest, and three-quarters of them supported Republican John McCain, but a core of white Democrats in this GOP stronghold voted for president-elect Barack Obama.

An exit poll by The Associated Press sheds a little more light on that outnumbered group: A majority were college-educated, higher-income Democrats who chose their candidate months ago. Three in five were women, and nearly all disapproved of the way President Bush has handled his job.

Among this group are de Rosset and Felicity Myers of Columbia, who arrived at their precinct early to vote for Obama.

"The economy, the war, the Bush administration. Need I say more?" de Rosset Myers, a 59-year-old clinical psychologist, said about his decision.

Felicity Myers said health care was her top issue. "I believe in Obama's values, and I believe he would be good for the country," said the 49-year-old health care administrator.

Among white voters supporting Obama, more than two-thirds earned more than $50,000 a year. Fewer than one in five voters were considered highly educated, meaning they were educated beyond one college degree, but they accounted for the biggest chunk of Obama's white supporters.

One in five white voters supporting Obama in South Carolina, where racial tensions still run high, said race was a factor in their decision, compared with about one-third of McCain's voters.

Michael Culler, who voted in Charleston, where the Civil War began, said he hopes Obama's win improves race relations.

"You can only hope that not only on the national stage but on the local stage as well there is impact," said the 37-year-old business management consultant. "You can always hope that's going to make a difference and improve where we are today."

More than half of Obama's white supporters identified themselves as politically moderate.

As a group, they did not vote a straight Democratic ticket. More than a quarter of white voters who backed Obama also checked the box for GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham, who easily kept his seat over Democratic challenger Bob Conley.

Overall, white voters' support for Obama on Tuesday represented no significant change from their support for Democrats in the last four presidential contests in South Carolina.

The case is different for black voters. As expected, nearly all black voters in South Carolina cast their ballot for Obama, the nation's first black president, surpassing their support for previous Democratic presidential candidates.

However, the black vote in South Carolina, as a proportion of the overall vote, was similar to previous elections.

Nationwide, voters younger than 30 supported Obama by a more than 2-1 margin. That was not the case in South Carolina, where just over half of young voters supported Obama.

Among white voters in South Carolina, most of Obama's support came from those ages 30 to 64.

The exit poll of 1,163 South Carolina voters was conducted for AP by Edison Media Research and Mitofsky International in a random sample of 20 precincts statewide. Results were subject to sampling error of plus or minus 4 percentage points, higher for subgroups.

system. "When you can remove one out of three people from the lines on Election Day, that means there won't be two-hour waits at the polls. Fewer voters are going to be inconvenienced." In 2000, confusing ballots and mismatched ballots enraged Florida voters. And in 2004, touch-screen machines refused to boot up, and Ohioans seethed while standing in line for as long as 14 hours. Things have changed since then. Electronic machines are no longer the darling of voting officials. In big electoral states such as California, Florida and Ohio, many precincts have junked them in favor of old-fashioned paper ballots read by optical scanners. Statewide voter registration databases, which are now required by law to help prevent a repeat of 2000, provide what are supposed to be comprehensive lists of eligible voters. The lists are not without problems, either. On Tuesday, in states including New York, Georgia, California and Pennsylvania, people at the polls complained they were dropped from the rolls. Their only option was to cast a provisional ballot, which is not recorded if poll workers cannot find a voter-registration record for each ballot.

Voting advocates said Wednesday those omissions still constitute a serious failure in the voting system. Sancho said such problems take years to correct. "We are inching our way toward a better electoral system," he said. "A lot of work remains."

Democrats
mustn't run amok with new power

Obama will have to serve all constituents, maintain checks on liberal Congress

History is made every day. Don't believe me? Ask a parent what a child's first steps or words mean to him or her. We make history every day simply by living out stories that will be told to future generations. And now, our generation witnessed a positive, historical American event Tuesday night. At 11 p.m., we witnessed Barack Obama being elected as the first president of African descent and the 44th overall.

I just hope Obama realizes how right he was when he described the road as long and daunting, and he said it may take more than one term. If he thought this campaign was hard fought, it was a mere Kilimanjaro compared to the Everest-like situation he is inheriting:

An economy that is teetering on the edge of collapse, an awful housing market, two war fronts, a multi-trillion-dollar debt, the threat of terrorism, immigration reform, a weak healthcare system, scarred foreign relations with allies and an American populace that has grown skeptical of its leaders.

Perhaps his biggest aid will be a democratically controlled Senate and House of Representatives. For the next two years, the Democrats will have an inside track to pass bills. The question is: Will Obama go along with the party on every bill, or will he stand up for what is best for the American populace and veto some bills? Also, will he be able to reach across the aisle to Republicans to make a truly bipartisan effort in Washington?

The simple fact is Obama cannot allow Nancy Pelosi, Harry Reid and the Democrats to have complete, unanswered and unchecked control with every decision that comes out of committees. Expect Obama to make a statement within his first few days to set the tone of his first term. It is still questionable whether it is the correct tone. But there will be plenty of time to worry about these questions ... in about 70 days or so. Between now and then, Obama will be told every decision that occurs in the White House while he assembles a cabinet he believes best suits America.

Until then, we should sit back and reflect on the history that was made that night and the sights and sounds witnessed across the United States. Never before, and never again, will anything of this sort happen.

Whether you supported Obama, John McCain or a third-party candidate, or whether you simply didn't vote, there is no doubting the significance of what happened. For the first time in a while, the world was watching the United States with open eyes and speechless tongues, and they will continue to watch to see what history Obama makes in the coming years. The only question is, will it be a history worth remembering?

Proposition 8 sets nation back

Anti-gay amendments in several states reverse trend of social progress

Like any Obama supporter, I'm pretty much thrilled right now. Not only did he win, he won decisively, and I will join many others in eagerly awaiting his inauguration.

But despite my elation over the presidential contest, I can't ignore the massive hit to civil rights that occurred in this election. Constitutional amendments banning gay marriage were approved in Arizona, Florida and even California; similarly, gay adoption has been banned in Arkansas.

If you're at all cynical, you weren't surprised by the decisions in Arizona, Florida or Arkansas. But the success of Proposition 8 in California is a bit of a head-scratcher, especially since gay marriage was legalized there earlier this year.

Proposition 8 wound up on the ballot because the opposition felt that the California Supreme Court had not accurately represented the "will of the people." Well, that's great, but I'm quite sure that segregation was the "will of the people" when the Brown v. Board of Education decision arrived. Sometimes social progress just has to be made without the approval of the ignorant.

Proposition 8 doesn't just deny gays in California the right to marry. It actually revokes that right, since same-sex marriage has been legal there since May. I find it shameful that in 2008, an American state bestowed rights on a minority group, only to take them away months later.

Unlike what opponents think, the fight for gay marriage is not about special privilege. It is about homosexuals obtaining the same level of rights that are offered to every heterosexual, because as it is, not even civil unions carry the same benefits as marriage. And even if they did, leaving a distinction between "marriage" and "civil union" implies that the latter is inherently unequal and inferior. It is not an acceptable compromise, nor should it be viewed as one.

Of course, these debates really just get me confused about why marriage — as a religious institution — even exists in the eyes of the state. In a perfect world, all couples would get civil unions for legal purposes, with marriages carried out in churches, synagogues, etc. I realize this won't happen, and I don't expect it to, but marriage has indeed evolved over its long existence. We've moved past treating women like property of their husbands, and if marriage survived that change of its tradition, I think accepting same-sex unions will work out OK.

All told, I'm happy that voters have set aside racial prejudice in electing a black man for president. But legalizing bigotry toward homosexuals is a step backward.

How I learned to divide by zero

After many years, curse has finally broken with Phillies' World Series win

Around 9:30 last Wednesday night, I was watching the second half of Game 5 of the World Series with my roommate, who knows and cares nothing about baseball.

"What do you love the most in the entire world?"

I asked him. "Math," he said.

"Okay, imagine this," I responded. "Imagine that, as long as you've lived, you've known people who can divide by zero. Imagine that you've come close to figuring out how to do it, but never succeeded. Now imagine that you can suddenly do it. Wouldn't that change your life?"

You see, I've lived and died with six sports teams since my youth: the Philadelphia Phillies, Eagles, 76ers and Flyers in the pros and Villanova basketball and Virginia Tech football in college. I've suffered through Joe Carter's home run, the rise and fall of Michael Vick and Eric Lindros and the constant drama that surrounded Allen Iverson. I've watched Allan Ray's phantom travel against North Carolina, Curt Schilling and Terry Francona win two World Series with Boston after failing to even lead the Phillies to a winning season and Donovan McNabb puke in the huddle during Super Bowl XXXIX.

In short, my life as a sports fan has been a Greek tragedy of sorts. I had never known even a hint of success, while the Boston, Dallas, New York and Atlanta fans who surrounded me rubbed my nose in my teams' shortcomings.

It was not fun. But in a moment, with Eric Hinske flapping like a wounded seagull at Brad Lidge's slider, all of that changed.

I now know what it's like to have my team on all the front pages for all the right reasons. I know what it's like to call people I hadn't spoken to in years just to share one moment's joy. I know what it's like to run around my apartment, bouncing off walls and swinging from the door frames, screaming at the top of my lungs because I was happier in that one moment than I had ever been in my entire life.

It doesn't erase the pain of sixteen years of falling for the same Three Stooges' eye-poking move, but it's a start.

Having my dreams crushed, usually as many as six times every year, gave me a sense of numbness to the teams I loved so much. I wondered if my relationship with the Phillies in particular would be considered an abusive one, considering that they hurt me again and again and I just kept coming back for more punishment.

But now that the unthinkable has happened to me, at long last, my faith has been restored. This team that I knew better than to believe in has made me whole once more. And I figure that if something this good can happen to me after so much pain, well, the sky's the limit.

IN OUR OPINION

Sunday alcohol sales
late coming, welcome

Voters in Blythewood and Richland County took a step into the twenty-first century Tuesday, voting to allow retailers to sell beer and wine on Sunday. While it is strange that such a vote would be required in 2008, it is even stranger that many blue laws remain on the books.

While Columbia residents will now be able to purchase beer or wine on Sunday, they will still have trouble should they attempt to purchase something "unnecessary" before 1:30 p.m. Heaven forbid John Smith decide to pick up a lava lamp instead of going to church.

instead of going to church.

With almost 40 counties enforcing some sort of blue laws, it's no wonder out-of-state residents and tourists are shocked to learn that South Carolina ostensibly shuts down much of the retail industry once a week. These laws make us look backward and have no place in our legal system.

While it probably doesn't affect overall business revenues greatly, individual stores can be disadvantaged based purely on their county. Most of Columbiana Centre opens at 1:30 on Sundays, except for the one shop that is actually located in Lexington County.

Removing the alcohol bans is a step in the right direction, but it's the first step in what needs to be a long walk. There is no reason these laws can't be repealed in the next two years and Sunday can't go back to being just another day. Because as far as the state is concerned, that's all it should be.

Asian restaurants for any occasion can be easily found in Columbia

Marin Mueller
STAFF WRITER

The GMP’s Mongolian Grill can only meet so many cravings for Asian-themed sustenance. For little more than the $6.99 price of stir-fry at Russell House, students can enjoy a variety of Eastern cuisine at restaurants conveniently located near campus.

Ranging from elegant sit-down restaurants to late-night delivery, these eateries prove that quality food in the South isn’t simply limited to barbeque.

Simultaneously the most popular and most infamous of Columbia’s Asian cuisine offerings, Grilled Teriyaki is a favorite stop for students when they frequent Five Points. Whatever complaints come from the restaurant’s naysayers are hardly indicative of the typical dining experience at Grilled Teriyaki. The restaurant’s Japanese-inspired tempura dishes are especially noteworthy and range from broccoli to soft shell crab. Also noteworthy are the seemingly endless hibachi grilled options, which include chicken, steak, tofu, scallops and even lobster.

For the more adventurous, Grilled Teriyaki offers plenty of custom sushi rolls. Favorites include the California eel roll and the dragon roll, both of which use smoked eel as a flavorful accent that adds to dish’s quality. Grilled Teriyaki, while often underestimated in quality, offers USC students late-night, quality dining and shouldn’t be overlooked.

Even more convenient is Tea Pot, a restaurant that offers delivery both on and off campus until as late as midnight. The restaurant’s generous portions and low prices make Tea Pot not only convenient, but also highly economical.

The restaurant’s specialties range from ginger beef to the tangy and spicy tangerine beef. The restaurant’s more traditional offerings such as egg rolls, fried rice, chow mein and lo mein don’t disappoint.

Admittedly, I know nothing about the atmosphere within Tea Pot, and most of Tea Pot’s patrons have never been inside the restaurant. Tea Pot’s main attractions are its convenience and quick delivery, combined with savory food. Admittedly, Tea Pot’s offerings can hardly be considered authentic Chinese food, but it is still perfect to satisfy late-night cravings.

On occasions deserving slightly more elegance, Miyo’s offers more upscale dining along with a varied menu. Located on Main street, Miyo’s is a short walk from campus, and its fast, quality service makes it almost as convenient as eating on campus.

Among the appetizers offered at Miyo’s, the lettuce wraps (which are served with either chicken or shrimp) and the crab wontons are both the perfect introduction for the meal to come. Miyo’s is able to make traditional dishes such as General Tso’s Chicken and Szechuan Beef stand out.

Still, the best dishes at Miyo’s are the specialties. Neither the ginger crab nor the Szechuan-style braised eggplant should be missed. If, after trying almost all that Miyo’s has to offer, you’re still hungry, the Godiva chocolate cake is pure bliss, and the cashew caramel cheesecake is unbelievably rich. While Miyo’s is slightly more expensive than the other restaurants discussed, it is well worth the price.

Although Columbia isn’t known for its exotic cuisine, these three restaurants prove that no matter what the occasion, Asian food can be easily found.

5 things we’re obsessing about this Week

Ellen Meder
ASSISTANT MIX EDITOR

1. Hitchcock

On the heels of Halloween, it is time for a change of pace as far as the movies that will elevate your heart rate. And with few thrillers at the box office looking, well, thrilling, Hitchcock is the answer. With unique ideas, genius plot and intriguing artistic direction that is still entertaining — even without the bells and whistles that many modern thrillers have replaced for substance — director Alfred Hitchcock’s vast trove of films deserve top billing at any movie night. The talent involved in making showers scary and finches frightening speaks volumes in Hitchcock’s more popular films like “Psycho” and “The Birds.” Also deserving of serious thought is “Dial M for Murder,” which later provided the inspiration for “The Perfect Murder.” “North by Northwest” and “Rear Window” are also good picks. Don’t forget to look for Hitchcock himself, as he makes a signature cameo appearance in each of his films.

3. Caramel

With temperatures taking a dive, the frequency of visits to coffee shops will be on the rise. One fun way to change up your drink of choice is to add caramel. If you are not adventurous enough to give pumpkin spice or gingerbread a try in your coffee, caramel can add a little sweet but subtle undertone to your drink to make it more festive. The caramel apple cider (whipped cream fully recommended) at Cool Beans is really heavenly. And while on campus, a caramel chai tea latte basically tastes like all of the happy and wonderful elements of Christmas, crazy family members not included.

4. Brett Dennen

This Californian seems to be cropping up everywhere these days, from television to Pandora.com’s shuffle. His most recent album “Hope for the Hopeless” was released Oct. 21 and provides if not a fresh, at least a comforting sound. This mellow, folksy guitar-toting solo artist sounds like a less soulful Jeff Buckley on tracks like “Closer to You” and “San Francisco” and will no doubt draw fans of John Mayer and James Blunt. Sometimes with a little bit of an adolescent sound (baby face aside), Dennen is nonetheless worth throwing into your playlists for an upbeat surprise and also worth keeping an eye on in the future.

5. TV on the Internet

With meetings, homework, tests and an incessant need to sleep when the opportunity presents itself, sometimes it’s difficult for college students to catch their favorite television shows when they originally air. As a character in the CW’s biggest guilty pleasure show, “Gossip Girl” said, “Who watches TV on a TV anymore anyway?” Pioneered by ABC, full episodes with fairly short and tolerable commercials are also available from NBC, CBS, ABC Family and The CW. Back seasons of many shows can also help you catch up on some of the more complex dramas like “Lost” or help you procrastinate by watching hours upon hours of comedies like “The Office.” With this convenience, having a meeting is no longer an excuse not to have the scoop on your favorite prime time soap at the water cooler.

2. Apples to Apples

Board games might have lost their appeal to most people after graduation from middle school, but if there is a single game that is worth another glance in college, it would be Apples to Apples. The game is actually really simple: For each round, a green adjective card is laid out for all to see, and each player, except one, chooses an appropriate card from their hand of red noun cards. Have no fear that English students have an advantage because the key is the appeal to the player who is serving as judge that round. This means that sometimes “my first kiss” will win for “perfect” and other times “Hitler” will serve as a trump card, depending on the relative disturbedness of your friends. The classic example of the perfect unholy pairing is “Helen Keller” and “touchy feely.” This “game of hilarious comparisons” also has no player limit.

CNN holographic reporter ranks high in networks’ excessive election coverage

Robert Johnson
THE DAILY GAMECOCK

Tuesday was truly a remarkable day for the United States of America. We will now be blessed with the first African-American president, whose popularity has grown all over the world. This election year will leave us with many memories both for supporters of Barack Obama and John McCain.

However, each news network was eager to impress the masses as they watched anxiously. Since the major news networks were all almost evenly matched in their coverage of the election, they went all-out trying to outdo one another in pure spectacle. We of course saw John King and his special electronic map, we saw MSNBC’s virtual hall of states and one network even had a three-dimensional White House. However, the most far-out imagery of these was likely the holographic reporter of CNN.

This excessive visual stunt created a nearly perfect, blue-outlined image of Jessica Yellin inside Wolf Blitzer’s “Situation Room.” She appeared just as if she was there, aside from a few blemishes and the distracting blue outline. The cameras in the studio were constantly panning to show how complete the effect was, and we saw more of the reporter with each movement. It did not look like an image was simply pasted onto the screen. At the time, she was said to be over a thousand miles away.

They achieved this by having technical experts build a special tent filled with a multitude of little high-definition cameras that were synced with the cameras in Blitzer’s studio. With Yellin surrounded by these cameras, they could superimpose her image into the “Situation Room” and make it look like she was a digitized holographic image. A conspicuous red circle indicated where she would appear to be standing. Blitzer would face the mark to make it look like he was talking to the hologram.

Wolf Blitzer was positively giddy when he announced the idea of a hologram being used for the first time on his program. In fact, both he and Yellin spent much of that time boasting about their grand achievement in holographic reporting. There was more self-congratulatory commentary than actual political commentary.

The irony of this is that while Yellin was expressing her eagerness to follow in Princess Leia’s footsteps, her image could have been shown just as easily on a simple monitor. On the other hand, it would not be quite as exciting.

‘Campaign ‘08’ aired its popular series finale Tuesday

Election like reality shows provides entertainment, has viewers vote for contestants

Aaron Barnhart
MCT Campus

I’m already missing the 2008 campaign.

I’m going to miss it the way I miss “The Wire.” The way I missed “Survivor” after Richard won. The way I missed France after Lance.

You might say that the long-running hit series “Campaign ‘08” aired its series finale on Tuesday. As is customary on such occasions, here is a fond farewell from your TV critic.

“Campaign ‘08” was a hugely compelling, wildly unpredictable reality-TV drama that captivated the public for well over a year. Millions tuned in, millions cast ballots for their favorite contestants. The media attention for this show and its quasi-celebrity contestants was intense.

Far from trivializing one of the most important acts a citizen of a democracy undertakes, the fact that “Campaign ‘08” was so entertaining meant that the public really paid attention this time.

One primary debate between Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, aired on a major network, drew a larger audience than any comedy or drama all season on NBC. Bill O’Reilly’s audience nearly doubled, to 4 million viewers.

The spillover into cable talk shows, late-night comedy shows, even such outlets as Nickelodeon and BET was unprecedented.

It was the writer David Halberstam who once observed that television combined theater with politics. These days it’s more like politics and “The Amazing Race,” but the point remains. You cannot remove showbiz from our national political process, and “Campaign ‘08” was full-on, high-wattage entertainment from the start.

Between Mike Huckabee and John McCain, the Clintons and the Obamas, this campaign featured more combined television throwweight than any political field in history, except when Ronald Reagan dined alone.

And like the “Amazing Race,” this campaign played out in three short cycles.

The first, in the fall of 2007, introduced us to the contestants and their storylines. You had the maverick (McCain), the legacy-bearer (Clinton), the upstart (Obama), the Christian rocker (Huckabee), Mr. Smooth (Mitt Romney), the politician from Alaska (no, not her — Mike Gravel), a few others whose names I forget and, of course, that lovable old salt Rudy.

Cycle 2 of “Campaign ‘08” (primary season) was marked by new alliances, wicked gamesmanship and tactical strategy.

Then McCain cashed in a fast-forward coupon and the race became all about Hillary and Barack.

Though it was no doubt annoying to many Democrats at the time, Clinton’s refusal to quit, in hindsight, burnished both candidates as only a dynamic rivalry can (say, the Celtics and the Lakers, who also renewed hostilities).

The news media — all too often given to calling the race like it was the Breeders’ Cup — were forced to inform the public about differences in competing health plans, approaches to foreign diplomacy and how a caucus is different from a

Chuck Kennedy / MCT Campus

We got a refresher course in who Sen. Joe McCarthy was and learned that the radical left and radical right were both thriving in American Christianity. It was very educational.

After ending this cycle on a sad note — the death of TV anchor Tim Russert — “Campaign ‘08” took most of the summer off. I thought this unfortunate, and I endorsed McCain’s idea of continuing the show right through the summer with a series of debates — kind of like “the moment of truth” without polygraphs. Obama’s producers felt differently.

The third cycle began in the fall — the final season, we were told, of “Campaign ‘08.” Fortunately, the contestants had saved the best for last. An eliminee was invited back (that would be Biden) while McCain played phone-a-friend brilliantly, bringing in the show’s breakout star, sassy Sarah Palin.

Polls tightened.

Crowds of thousands gathered to root on their heroes in gatherings worthy of “American Idol.” To be sure, there did seem a point when “Campaign ‘08” jumped the shark (“Down the Stretch, It’s Horse Race Coverage,” is the finding of a new report from the decidedly nonentertained Project for Excellence in Journalism).

But for much of the fall season, it was exciting, it felt fresh and best of all, it really did seem like the two best contestants had made it to the final round.

In monetary terms, the producers of “Campaign ‘08” spared no expense, and that upset some TV turn-off types in the audience.

But let’s have some perspective here. A network like ABC or NBC probably spends more money developing, producing and promoting one season of television than the McCain and Obama camps spent getting to Election Night.

And c’mon, admit it: You enjoyed watching this political show more than “Grey’s Anatomy” anyway, didn’t you?

HOROSCOPES

ARIES Social activities can get very expensive very quickly. Don't buy something you really can't afford just to be popular.

TAURUS A surprise bonus helps you get just what you wanted. Celebrate with friends, but don't overdo it.

GEMINI Go ahead and begin a new endeavor, even if the one you're working on isn't quite finished yet. This is a good day for launching projects.

CANCER There's one hassle after another, but the overall outcome is good.

LEO Your partner's

brilliant move helps you achieve your goal. This is one of the reasons you should always hang out with talented people. You already knew that, right?

VIRGO The work is challenging and you may not be quite certain if you got it right. Keep studying the instructions, but use your imagination, too.

LIBRA Don't let your friends or loved ones talk you into spending more than you can afford.

SCORPIO You should be finding it easier to express yourself in writing. You have several messages you want to get across. Work on them now.

SAGITTARIUS Conditions are pretty good for taking on technical challenges. You might decide to hire an expert, and that would be OK.

CAPRICORN In order to get different results, you'll have to do something different. You've been thinking about this for quite some time, so go ahead and do it.

AQUARIUS After a very tough confrontation, all ends well. This is mostly due to the other people on your team.

PISCES Vague worries may be showing up in your dreams, dressed in outrageous outfits. They have no substance.

Carolina tips off season

New coach, new style, returning players give basketball fans plenty of things to be excited about

Michael Aguilar
SPORTS EDITOR

All this week, campus has been abuzz. Change is in the air, a new frontier is upon us, a new day is dawning, the future is now — all these clichés have been thrown around all week. Surely students only have one thing on their minds at this point: the beginning of a new era in Gamecock basketball.

Friday night at 7 p.m. marks the beginning of the Darrin Horn reign at USC as the Gamecocks take on Kentucky Wesleyan in an exhibition match, and most couldn't be more excited. The players themselves can feel the excitement in the air and are desperate to feed off of the fans' energy once the season starts.

"The fans are right on the court," said senior guard Zam Fredrick. "If you make a big shot or a bad call, they can react and you can see their facial expressions. If we get [the Colonial Life Arena] full in there, we feel that we can play to our utmost potential."

The million-dollar question this season is: What is that potential? If the Gamecocks play to their utmost potential, where will that put them?

With a brand new coach and system along with older, more experienced players, there are certainly more questions than answers for Carolina fans. However, many of those questions may be answered Friday. The exhibition match will not end up on USC's final record, but it may give fans the insight that they have been waiting for all offseason.

Firstly, what will Horn's new strategy bring to the floor?

Horn made a name for himself at Western Kentucky by running a fast-paced, non-stop action style of offense. The Hilltoppers averaged nearly 78 points a game last season on their way to a Sweet Sixteen finish.

The Gamecocks did not perform as well. They averaged 72 points per game and struggled mightily down the stretch. USC did not score more than 70 points in its last five regular season games.

However, Carolina and Horn are seemingly meant for each other. While the Gamecocks do not have much height or size other than junior center Mitchell Carter, who stands at 6-foot-10 and weighs 260 pounds but is an inch taller and 30 pounds heavier than the next biggest players, they do have speed.

At times last season, USC would sport a three-guard offense led by junior Devan Downey, Fredrick and junior Brandis Raley-Ross, with 6-foot-7 junior Dominique Archie playing the four spot and 6-foot-7 sophomore Mike Holmes playing at center. This size and quickness lends itself perfectly to Horn's style, and so far in practice, the players have loved the new offense.

"We feel so free out here," Fredrick said. "Even to be able to make mistakes. As long as they are aggressive mistakes, Coach has nothing to say."

Gamecock fans are also eager to see whether the team's two preseason All-SEC picks, Archie and Downey, will live up to the hype. Downey was selected as a first team player, and many pro scouts have the 5-foot-9 point man going in the lottery of this year's NBA Draft. Archie has been a consistent contributor in his three years at Carolina, but as one of the most experienced players on this year's team, it should be time for him to step in as a team leader.

Needless to say, plenty of excitement has surrounded the first game of Horn's career at Carolina. The team is only hoping that the fans will bring some energy of their own to the game.

"At home when people are cheering, you just feed off that and the adrenaline is going to where you feel like you can do things that you don't normally do," Frederick said.

The game tips off at 7 p.m. Friday, and admission is free. However, unlike the women's first exhibition, there will be a fee for parking.

Exhibition begins USC's Staley era

Women's basketball uses game with Peach State as opportunity to prepare for regular season

Scott Waggoner
THE DAILY GAMECOCK

The women's basketball team will see its first action of the season this Thursday at the Colonial Life Arena in an exhibition game against Peach State. The contest will be the first one of the much-anticipated Dawn Staley era here at USC.

With the addition of Staley, South Carolina comes into the season with high hopes, and they will look to get off to a good start when they take the court against Peach State. Before coming to USC this year, Staley had coached the Owls at Temple University, where she led them to four Atlantic 10 tournament titles and six NCAA tournament appearances. She has solidified herself as a successful coach in women's basketball, and her experience should help a young South Carolina team.

"It's no different for me," Staley said of her first game as the head coach at USC. "I just want to prepare our team well enough to put them in position to win games."

This will be USC's only preseason game before they open the season against Penn State in State College, Pa., on Nov. 16. Thursday's game will serve to show the progress the Gamecocks have made in the off-season, as they will be able to compare themselves to another team.

"They allow you to assimilate to real games," Staley said of preseason games. "We've been pretty much beating each other up. When you see someone you're not used to, you can really measure if things are being executed."

Staley plans to use the game as a final preparation for the regular season. The Gamecocks squad features a young set of guards, and the exhibition game should give them some valuable experience.

"We need to find an identity, see who we are, and how we want to play," said head coach Dawn Staley. "We want to get up and down the floor. In our practices, we really haven't handled playing fast. We have been playing fast and had a lot of turnovers, and we want to get that part under control."

Though it is an exhibition game, USC is hoping to play well and gain some confidence before the season starts. A solid performance on Thursday will put the Gamecocks in a good mindset going into regular season play.

"As an athlete, confidence plays a big role in how you perform," Staley said on the significance of executing against Peach State. "You have a psychological edge when you play well. We need to come out, and certain players need to play well moving into the regular season."

Tip-off for the game will be at the Colonial Life Arena at 7 p.m. Admission and parking will be free.

Women's tennis takes on SEC

Schofield, Miller lead Gamecocks into weekend tournament

Morgan Henley
THE DAILY GAMECOCK

The Gamecock women's tennis team will be traveling to Tuscaloosa, Ala., today to compete in the SEC Fall Coaches Classic. Only two players from the Carolina team will be competing this weekend, senior Gira Schofield and freshman Ashley Miller. This will be the team's final tournament of the fall season before heading into the much more competitive spring season.

The Gamecocks will see opponents from all over the SEC with players from each school represented. Last season the team finished at the bottom of the SEC East standings, tied with Kentucky. There will be 16 players in the singles tournament and 16 pairs in the doubles.

"Every SEC team is [a threat]," said Coach Arlo Elkins. "They're the strongest teams in the country."

The last time the team competed was in the Wildcat Invitational in Evanston, Ill., almost four weeks ago. Schofield won the singles by defeating fellow Gamecock junior Ana Marija Zubori in the top flight singles match along with another ranked player in her four matches. In doubles with sophomore Miljana Jovic, she was defeated by senior Natasa Vuckovic and Zubori in the top flight doubles match. Schofield is ranked No. 31 in the country and played as the team's number one in both singles and doubles. Zubori is ranked No. 54. Zubori and Schofield together as a doubles team are ranked No. 19 in the country.

Schofield is the highest-ranked player on the team and won this tournament as a freshman. This year she is 4-3 in both singles and doubles yet hasn't been able to play as much as other players because of her busy academic schedule in her senior year.

Freshman Ashley Miller along with senior Suzanna Mansour defeated Minnesota's Karina Chiarelli and Elena Kazakova in the flight B doubles match at the Wildcat Invitational. This will be Miller's first trip to the SEC Coaches Classic. She was ranked as one of the top 50 recruits coming out of high school. Miller's career in high school was so impressive that her high school named their tennis courts after her.

"This is a chance for Schofield to play against SEC opponents and see where she stands," Elkins said. "We're interested to see how Miller does against SEC competition as well."

This fall season is instrumental in deciding the roster for the spring season, when rankings are determined. The team will move from individual play to team play.

"This tournament isn't that pivotal," said Elkins. "We judge by the whole fall season. The lineup will change match to match in the early part of the season anyways."

The match begins this Thursday at 4 p.m. with two rounds of doubles. There will be two singles matches Friday, two doubles and one singles Saturday and one singles match Sunday. The results from the matches will be on www.rolltide.com throughout the weekend.

Seniors hope to leave on high note

Miles injured, Spurrier undecided on quarterback as final home game nears

Sam Davis
THE DAILY GAMECOCK

This weekend, the Carolina Gamecocks will play their final home game of the 2008 season, hosting Arkansas. After a 21-point victory against conference rival Tennessee last week and with the homecoming game approaching, USC Coach Steve Spurrier expects another strong performance.

"We should have a full house, a good crowd, and hopefully our guys will be ready to play our best game of the year," Spurrier said after Wednesday night's practice. "We haven't had it yet. We're still shooting for it."

One of the only potentially significant injuries for the Gamecocks approaching Arkansas is freshman tailback Kenny Miles, who will miss at least a game due to a scooter accident. Miles, however, did not carry the ball in last week's victory.

"Kenny got all scuffed up pretty good, so he's out for a couple weeks," Spurrier said. "But he's okay. He just got his face looking like he slid into second base on a paved road."

As in the majority of the Gamecocks' previous games, USC will have more than one quarterback see the field.

"Why wouldn't we? We haven't had one play well enough to deserve to play the entire game," Spurrier said. "We're planning on getting both of them in there, and we'll see how it goes from there."

Yet Spurrier is still not satisfied with the quarterbacks' level of play or their decisions.

"Our quarterbacks should play better. I know our protection isn't all that great, but when it is good, we should be hitting guys," Spurrier said. "Sometimes they act like they don't know where they are and they just take off and run. Stephen likes to run quickly, but we have to throw the ball to our guys when we have the

Ben Fine / THE DAILY GAMECOCK
According to Spurrier, Stephen Garcia hasn't played well enough to secure his spot as the Gamecock's quarterback.

Soccer looking for victory against UCF

Following draw, USC plans to solidify third seed with triumph over Knights

Michael Baumann
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

After Saturday's stunning draw against Tulsa, a team which had previously been perfect in conference play, USC's men's soccer team now looks forward to the C-USA tournament, set to start next week. Only one obstacle stands between the Gamecocks and another crack at their conference's best.

The Gamecocks (7-5-4) host the Central Florida Golden Knights (6-10) at Stone Stadium Friday in a perfect example of a trap game.

The Knights, coming off a last-second defeat, will be eager to finish the season strong after a heartbreaking loss to Florida Atlantic on a 90th-minute goal on senior night. UCF will take that frustration out on Carolina if the Gamecocks start looking ahead to the tournament.

Carolina coach Mark Berson's remarks after the Tulsa game seem to indicate his faith in his team's ability to focus.

"This is a team of fighters," Berson said after the draw with Tulsa. "We've come off a very difficult stretch where we've played three games in seven days, traveled nearly 3,000 miles with two of the games on the road, and have given up one goal and been undefeated in that stretch. That speaks to the character of this team."

On the field, the key matchup to watch will most likely take place in the UCF end, as the two teams pit strength against strength.

Carolina boasts a strong strike partnership

Alan Tauber / THE DAILY GAMECOCK

of sophomores Blake Brettschneider and Sam Arthur, who have combined for 16 goals and five assists this season. They will have to dissect a UCF defense that features senior captain Bryan Collier and an intimidating goalkeeper in 6-foot-4-inch, 220-pound sophomore Sean Johnson.

This will be the last home game for USC's seniors, including forward Kevan Hawkins and midfielders David Smith, Brennan

Williams and Spencer Lewis. USC is in a four-way tie for third place in the conference with nine points, but the team sits sixth on tiebreakers. A win — combined with losses or draws by Memphis and Marshall — would leave USC in sole possession of third place, while a loss could drop the Gamecocks all the way down to seventh in the nine-team conference.

PRACTICE ● Continued from 10

Senior running back Mike Davis carried the majority of the load for the Gamecocks last week. He will do so again this week, but he will also share with freshman Eric Baker.

Not only does this week's contest represent the last home game of the season, but for many senior athletes, it will be their last chance to play football in Williams-Brice Stadium. One of those seniors is middle linebacker and team leader Jasper Brinkley.

"I just want to go out and play hard and thank the fans for allowing me to be here and supporting me to be here throughout the whole time," Brinkley said. "There's no looking back."

Reflecting on the defense, which could be considered one of the strongest in school history, Brinkley highlights the selflessness of the unit above all else.

"There are no 'me' guys on this team. That makes the defense a whole lot better," Brinkley said. "Guys are always pushing together because they feel like they can get the job done, and that's what we do."

At times throughout the 2008 season, the Gamecocks have looked miserable. After back-to-back losses and ugly wins earlier in the season, many would have declared the season nearly a waste. Four victories in the last five games have turned the season around and have USC a bowl-eligible and hopeful team.

Yet there is still work left — meat on the bone. The Gamecocks need to get past a strong Arkansas defense followed by road games against top-ranked SEC rival Florida and an always strong Clemson team. Clearly, there's plenty of football left for Jasper Brinkley and Carolina's seniors.

USC plans winning weekend

Equestrian, men's tennis, swimming and diving, travel to Georgia, Florida

Austin Smallwood
THE DAILY GAMECOCK

Men's Tennis

The men's tennis team will travel to Athens, Ga., this weekend to participate in the Bulldog Scramble. The field at this tournament will not only include Georgia but also SEC foes Kentucky and Ole Miss. Georgia Tech will also be at the scramble.

The Gamecocks will play their toughest games of this fall season as they face the Georgia Bulldogs, who have won back-to-back national championships. The key performer for the Gamecocks this season has been junior Pedro Campos, who has compiled a 4-1 record in singles play as well as a 2-1 in doubles.

The Gamecocks squad, though, is far from a one-man team as they have shown great depth in the beginning of the season. Junior Diego Cubas has been unstoppable with an impressive 5-0 record. An early-season win at a competitive tournament would propel the Gamecocks to a breakthrough spring season.

Swimming and Diving

The men's and women's swim and dive team will travel to Gainesville, Fla., this week to take on the Florida Gators. Both the men and women are coming off an impressive victory over rival Clemson last Friday. That win was the first win for both teams this season as they now have a 1-2 record.

The highlight of the victory was the performance by sophomore Taryn Zack. The sophomore diver was voted SEC female diver of the week for the second time this season.

The Gators have gotten off to a strong start this season with an overall record of 2-1 and a 2-0 record in SEC competition. The key performer for the Gators this season has been sophomore Balazs Gercsak. The sophomore swimmer was voted SEC male swimmer of the week after his performance in Florida's victory over the Georgia Bulldogs. The meet will begin at 2 p.m. at the O'Connell Center Natatorium.

Equestrian

The equestrian team like the men's tennis team will be traveling to Athens, Ga., this weekend to compete against the Georgia Bulldogs. The traditionally outstanding Gamecock squad has gotten off to a disappointing start this season. While the final results have not been ideal for the Gamecocks, the team has seen several outstanding performances.

While the Gamecocks

recently lost to TCU, they did receive three MVP performances by Carly Babcock, Megan Massaro and Katie Grossnickle. The Gamecocks will look to turn the season around against a Georgia team that suffered its first loss of the season last weekend. The loss came to Auburn University by a score of 12-5. The Auburn Tigers are the only opponent against which both teams have competed this season.

While the Gamecocks lost to Auburn as well, they did so by a smaller margin than the Bulldogs, losing 10-6. The match against Georgia will put an end to the fall season for the Gamecocks, who will look for better and brighter results in the spring.

The Carolina Greek Community

congratulates the following chapters as Fraternity and Sorority of the Month for November Fraternity of the Month: Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity, Inc.

Members of Alpha Phi Alpha attended the South Carolina District Conference Oct 9th-12th where they received the following awards:

- 1st place in the Step Show
- Best Web site in the SC Alpha Phi Alpha district
- 1st runner up in the Ms. Black and Gold Pageant

Members also held a voter registration drive in hopes to register more college students.

Sorority of the Month: Gamma Phi Beta Sorority

Members of Gamma Phi Beta recently brought Mark Sterner to campus to speak on the dangers of drinking and driving. He spoke to students about his experience with a DUI and the death of his four best friends as a result of his choices.

The chapter is also working towards becoming more "Green" by reducing the amount of non recyclable materials used in their house and using less Styrofoam and plastic containers.

Congratulations for Achieving Excellence!
